Viewing Borges exhibit

By FELIX BONILLA NORAT
Special to the STAR

In Arecibo's Regional College, through March 17, Roland Borges Soto is showing some new works, along with those he recently exhibited in Hato

Rey's Department of Education gallery.

His newest works which interest me, since his previous batch of textured organic planes tended to form a simplified landscape vision of the world, as if of an entrance to the ancestral caves. Now a long-stemmed cup-like shape suggesting fallopian tubes and a series of vertical rhythmic presences are beginning to people his universe. Such signs are pregnant for the future; it's just a question of time before Borges can fully capture them.

Borges is still "Fa Presto" of spirit; he works so fast in everything he does. He has to, to keep up with his busy schedule in writing a book, as Art Teacher of the Arecibo Trina Padilla de Sanz High School, as art columnist for his hometown newspaper, as builder of his own home, as helper in putting up shows of work by his colleagues and himself, and as a painter. But I do hope he gets to resolve those new pregnant signs with all the painterly and fine tactile qualities he can get when he doesn't use acrylics as the thin fast-drying medium which it is.

Most of our painters use acrylics too thinly. I wonder if this is because of their expense. In the other group are those who indiscriminately use thick textures built-up with sand and other materials and mediums without regard to the final "presence" and needs of each painting. Both groups have not fully learned to use acrylics, and Borges should try to teach all of us since he could combine Fa Presto with Fa Lento if he wanted. He has done so before.

"Do me fast in slow motion, Borges," say the modern acrylics, the children of petroleum, grandchildren of black oozy oils, great grandchildren of the past forests on this earth. Did we ever have forests on our coastline? How fast or long will they last as oils?

How fast or slow as acrylics?
